THE RESURRECTION
THE GOSPEL COALITION

Today’s scholars seriously discuss the resurrection’s historicity. They recognize that the ancient sources tell a coherent narrative about the days following Jesus’s death. The mainstream view among historians today is that it’s more probable than not that Jesus’s tomb was empty and that people genuinely believed they saw the resurrected Jesus.

The three earliest independent accounts of the empty tomb are found in Mark 16:1–8, John 20:1–10, and 1 Corinthians 15:3–5. Three different people separately recorded that the tomb was empty. Matthew and Luke also record the empty tomb in their Gospels but their accounts probably depend on Mark as a source.

Mark reports that three women discovered the empty tomb (cf. Matt. 28:1–8; Luke 24:1–3). As Dale Allison argues, the lack of additional theological and apologetic arguments in Mark’s account indicates his report is rooted in historical memory. The strongest evidence for the historical reliability of the empty tomb accounts is that they rely on women’s testimonies. In ancient Near Eastern society, a woman’s testimony wasn’t considered reliable. Josephus denounced evidence provided by women (Antiquities 4.219), and the Mishnah said women shouldn’t be witnesses (Mishnah Shabuot 4.1). The Gospel writers were aware of this bias, but they decided to record the women’s testimonies anyway. They wouldn’t do so if the story were false.

But we know – HE LIVES!
